Abstract Over the years, public and private sector spending is regulated by activities in the oil and gas industry. Nigeria's balance sheet is uncertain about the international price of crude oil and any shock on the price of oil affects the country's general activities. With quarterly data from 1981Q1 to 2020Q2, the study uses a heterostensive exponential generalized conditional heteroscedasticistic approach to examine oil price volatility and the level of inflation in Nigeria.... It is a crucial sector that provides job opportunities for most Nigerians, and is responsible for more than a third of total gross domestic product (GDP), FAO (2012); Adetunji and Adeyemo, (2012) and Finlutell, 2013). Whether you're a blog collaborator, publisher, or just a regular blog reader, you probably read posts that left you scratch your head, wondering "So, what was your point?" Even if you've been blogging for a while it's likely that you have created one or two posts (or more) that have never been published because after finishing writing Reread and you immediately realize you have just given birth to nonsense! Here is an approach we recommend to avoid losing time writing (or worse, publishing) useless posts: always start with a statement of thesis. This is going to help ensure that what you write is focused, relative and important to your readers. A A A statement of thesis is a fundamental element of all good writing, for the simple reason that serves as a foundation and structure for what discussion you want to do or point of view you want to support. As a writer, your thesis helps you focus by forcing yourself to declare exactly what you are proposing, discussing or defending. When you provide readers with a clear vision, it is much easier for them to quickly assess their relevance; they can see immediately if your view is something that matterstheir life or their work. Which brings me to my thesis in this blog: Bloggers will improve the overall quality of their posts and in the process attract more readers and followers if they write a thesis for every assignment. In fact, it should be part of each placeâs introduction. Not only will the quality be improved; you will probably be more efficient too.Here's how to write an effective thesis that will lead to more powerful blogging: 1. Start with a specific answer to a relevant question. Many great bloggers are experts in "how to do" and as you can see they have learned to listen to customers or potential customers for questions on how best to do specific things. A "How do you caulk a window?A", A "What is the best way to interview a CFO candidate?A", A "How should I train for my first marathon?A" These are all great questions that lead to specific answers. These are not controversial, but they still lead to relevant theses and potentially interesting blogs. Another important topic area is "What's better, A or B?" The question could be about competing software, techniques for finding the perfect hotel, or choosing an underground pool. Your answer takes a position, hopefully unambiguously, although your answer needs to be a bit more precise (I will explain why concrete pools are the best choice for durability and value, except in situations with soil drainage problems). The important thing is to demonstrate in your thesis how specific you are going to get, because specificity = relevance to readers. 2. Set Readers' Expectations The expectations you create with your thesis either block the reader from finishing reading your post, and maybe signing up for your blog, or push them off your site out of apathy towards your topic. Going back to the pool example, if your research indicates that maintenance is a major concern or area of interest for potential customers, your thesis should mention maintenance as a dimension you will address. 3. Frame a problem and provide evidence for your point of view. Whatever the topic, you need to make it clear where you are and why the reader should pay attention. "Google has just released its controversial Hummingbird algorithm; I'm going to tell you why the company has reduced the focus on keywords is actually good for inbound marketers. "Once you have all your writers trained in the use of theses, don't let anyone start writing until they have presented their thesis to your editorial team to review and challenge it. Challenging is not an attack, it is a quality check and an opportunity to improve. Ask these questions: Is it framed as a relevant issue for your key characters? Is it specific enough to make the case in the space and in the assigned words? Do you have enough evidence or skills to make a strong and credible argument? If the answers are all yes, it's time to start writing. There's one more thing to consider: When you're done writing, go back and if the article fits perfectly to the thesis, or if in writing it was natural to go beyond what initially planned, if after review reviewsee that you could make an even stronger complaint in your thesis, reflect that since it is intended to help the reader's involvement.
