I recently discovered a show that I really like. And by "discovered," I mean "I'm sure it's been on for a while now, but I'm too old to be watching MTV."Anyway, the show's called "Exiled," and it involves taking some of the obnoxious little debutants who previously had their opulent Sweet 16 birthday parties documented by the network and sending them off to remote areas of the world for a week so that their parents don't have to go through the trouble of actually instilling some sort of values in them. It's infuriating to see how the girls behave, but thanks to schadenfreude, it's also very satisfying to watch them suffer. And it might just be at least one small step in helping our economy. For most people, one of the biggest disappointments of the recent economic meltdown in this country has been the revelations of just how wasteful large corporations are. They beg for handouts and then waste the money doing the same things that got them in trouble to begin with. There's no accountability or even much evidence that any attempt will be made to change. There's an overwhelming stench of entitlement. It's sort of like dealing with...a spoiled teenage girl.*Lightbulb*Sending greedy CEOs off to third-world countries to shovel elephant poo would no doubt be entertaining, but it wouldn't do much to help the economy. On the other hand, if the idea is to make them appreciate how the real world works, why not force them to earn their bailout money by working for small businesses?Imagine watching as Congress tells Rick Wagoner, Allan Mullaly and Robert Nardelli that they're off to spend a week bussing tables at some of Detroit's up-and-coming locally owned restaurants or taking appointments at the doggy day spa. Shock and denial become reality as they don their aprons and name badges, pushed to the brink of working-class madness before emerging transformed and returning tearfully to Congress to get a big hug and tell everyone how much they learned.All kidding and hand-wringing aside, it's clear that what these people need is a heavy dose of reality. And in a world where something like 98 percent of businesses are small businesses, it's only natural that they'd fall out of touch at some point. So who better to bring them back to Earth than the entrepreneurs they used to be? Everyone wins. The Day After 9/11, This Family-Owned Jam Company Lost All of Its Airline Business. But after some digging by a Deadspin reporter, it was discovered that Kekua never existed, and hence the reference to "catfish," which refers to this type of Internet dating hoax and is the name of a reality TV show. Te'o now says he was duped into an elaborate online ruse conducted through social media by an impostor.But whether or not Te'o's story is credible, people do fall in love with people they've only ever met online, and the feelings are very real, according to experts who study online communication."It probably doesn't happen to a large percentage of people, but it happens occasionally, and it's very intense," said Joseph Walther, a communications scientist at Michigan State University, who has studied online relationships.Ideal love!The online environment is a hothouse for cultivating idealized love. For one, people don't have much information about their partners online, Walther said. [How Do I Love Thee? Experts Count 8 Ways]That leads people to "fill in the blanks" with either very positive or negative details, idealizing a love interest, he told LiveScience.In addition, the Internet provides the perfect way to nurture that seed of romantic love into something more intense, said Catalina Toma, a communications professor at the University of Wisconsin at Madison, who has studied deception in online relationships. Especially in chat rooms or text messaging, the pressure of responding in real-time is removed, she said."You have a lot of control over what you say and to be very selective about how you present yourself," Toma told LiveScience.The anonymity of the Internet also fuels the need to overshare. Because there is little to no information about body language or emotion online, people feel comfortable with disclosing more about themselves, which both encourages personal disclosures from the other person and fosters an intense sense of intimacy, she said.Making the online world real!However, most of the time, people have a strong desire to take online relationships offline, Toma said. Most people start with email or chat, then progress to photographs, phone calls, or Skype, and eventually arrange face-to-face dates. When they meet, love may bloom or wither, depending on how much fantasy lines up with reality.Still, it's not typical to spend a year in an intense, emotionally intimate relationship online without actually meeting, as the football player says he did with his "girlfriend" Kekua, Toma said.In fact, research by psychologist Monica Whitty of the University of Leicester has shown that people who date online soon realize the dangers of keeping romance in cyberspace, Walther said."The longer they go on online without meeting face-to-face, the more idealized they become," he said.To avoid turning the real-life frog into a cyberprince, most people prefer to take things offline fairly quickly, he said.Follow LiveScience on Twitter @livescience. We're also on Facebook & Google+. Sometimes looking for love takes a back seat these days—especially with demanding schedules that include working long hours and furthering educational goals. While technology is a very large factor in causing people stay so busy, it's also helping people connect more, even in the romantic sense. Not every person who dates online is as horribly geeky as Napoleon Dynamite's brother Kip—there are some cool geeks out there just waiting for you to meet them. In fact, more than forty million Americans have tried online dating at one time or another and some have walked away very happy. "My wife refuses to let me try it. Go figure," Bryan C Webb, technical marketing professional from Ontario Canada Though different people swear by certain online dating websites, the number one free online dating website in the U.S., U.K. and Canada is Plentyoffish.com, run by CEO Markus Frind. Since its 2003 launch, the site has grown by word of mouth to more than 13 million page views each day. According to Frind, there's always a jump in site traffic between the day after Christmas through the Wednesday after Valentine's Day, as well as just before Thanksgiving. Singles tend to join the site around family-related holidays—anytime they're reminded of being single. Frind says. The mastermind behind this website, Frind claims anyone in his position has to be a romantic after reading so many happy stories from users who've met someone great on his site. "It's part of the reward of doing this site," he says. (Frind, however, met his own girlfriend offline). Denver-based Jon Freeman, however, chose to use an online dating website to as a platform to increase his chances of finding a suitable person. "I was a two time 'loser' having used less than intelligent methods to find the 'right person' and figured I needed a better process—the Web gave me just that ability (I know, so romantic)," Freeman says. "I'd tried other sites and even online personals, but in the end I went for the site with the most people on it to increase my odds on finding the perfect one." While using Matchmaker.com, Freeman realized that the "percent match function" wasn't helping him so he made some minor changes—his favorite color turned from orange into blue and his pet lizard became a dog—which actually helped him meet his future wife. Within a year of their initial online connection, Freeman got married. "We finish each others sentences and rarely argue or fight. We are very much in love with each other," Freeman says, still satisfied with his online dating experience. Brad Thomas, from Kentucky, met his wife through instant messaging and agrees that there isn't any special recipe for meeting people online. "I've never used a dating site or agency. So I think online "dating" encompasses a whole lot more than just eHarmony, virtual worlds etc. You don't need a virtual meeting "place" as such, just a mode of communication." Thomas—who met his sweetheart in the U.S., invited her to the U.K. with him, proposed in Paris and now lives with her in the U.S.—isn't afraid to go the extra mile for love. But even for those that never meet their love interest in person, some, like Jared Ubricaco from Florida, find online relationships rewarding. In 2007, Ubricaco was an online gaming fanatic, and after regularly playing World of Warcraft (WOW) for a few months, he realized he didn't know anything about the other online gamers, especially one female player in particular. "Sometimes we had this mind connect," Ubricaco says about his relationship with the female player. After the two players began talking during game play, they realized they hit it off and kept in touch for more than a year while Ubricaco worked in the States and she taught English overseas. Normal people write letters and talk on the phone, but we kept in touch through voice chat rooms and e-mails, Ubricaco says, adding that they also sent small presents to each other for holidays and birthdays. The two were, in a sense, dating. However, after she returned home to the States, they lost touch for a few months before he found her on World of Warcraft again. Though they've still never met in person, they keep in touch through e-mail and he's been invited to visit her in Washington. While technology is streamlining how we meet others, sustaining a long term relationship with someone only online is tough. At some point, signing offline and meeting up for a cup of coffee is a much needed next step. Just remember, to get to the coffee phase, make sure your Internet connection is strong enough so you don't accidentally sign off in the middle of a getting-to-know you conversation or your potential love muffin might get miffed.
