a small museum devoted to a fairly uncommon instrument, and the fact that the museum was only open for two hours a week meant we had pretty low expectations. However, the Estey Organ Museum ended up being one of our favorite destinations on our trip. The museum is located inside the old factory buildings where Estey Organs were once made. The large slate buildings have since been renovated to house various businesses and apartments alongside the museum. Inside, you'll find dozens of organs are hooked up to electric power supplies, while others require a hand crank or foot pedals to be worked in order to produce any sound. Best of all, every instrument in the building is available for visitors to play. Getting the chance to play antique organs was an absolute blast, even if we could only remember how to play Hot Cross Buns and Chopsticks. Our favorite instrument was a traditional pipe organ with an open back which allowed you to literally go inside the instrument while someone else played, creating the ultimate surround-sound experience. If the interactive aspect of the museum wasn't enough, there was an abundance of interesting information to discover about the history of organ making in Southern Vermont.
